Determination of the rate of hydrolysis of 6-mercaptopurine riboside and 6-thioguanine nucleotides by human liver ribonucleotide reductase. Incubation of [3H]6-mercaptopurine riboside or [3H]6-mercaptopurine nucleotides with unenriched human liver ribonucleotide reductase protein leads to preferential incorporation of the labeled nucleosides into ribonucleotides. A simple procedure is described for determining the rate of this incorporation. In the presence of 1 mM dithiothreitol, one of these four nucleosides is slowly converted to its corresponding nucleotide, and only a small fraction of the nucleotides are ribonucleotide reductase substrates. The reaction rate in the presence of dithiothreitol and 0.6 mM 6-mercaptopurine nucleotide is much greater than the incorporation of unbound 6-mercaptopurine nucleotide into the same ribonucleotide reductase preparation by incubation in the absence of dithiothreitol. In contrast, the rates of the hydrolysis of 6-thioguanosine riboside and 6-thioguanosine nucleotides by this preparation are very similar. Incubation of [3H] 648931e174
